3. Monetization Models

We propose the following software monetization models for making our system sustainable:

(A) Subscription / Freemium Model

Freemium model is a software monetization model where a software offers both free and premium features to users depending on the user's level. Free features can be accessed by anyone, but premium features require a fee to access. Usually, the free features of a software is enough to complete the user's task. However, premium features are offered to the users to increase their user experience, task efficiency, and productivity. Lickit is a free to use job posting website, where anyone can access its full functionalities regardless if they have paid a fee or not. However, Lickit provides a 2-tier membership level: "Free" users and "Premium" users. Although the free users are able to access Lickit's full functionalities, some quality of life features are locked behind a paywall. For example, common premium features include removing advertisements to reduce screen clutter and distractions, which greatly increases the user's experience and satisfaction. boosted appearance in job application post lists, no advertisements, and 2 free courses per month. Besides, there would also be additional quality of life perks such as a premium badge for public display. The additional features and perks are designed to improve the user's overall experience with the software, and thus attract users to purchase their premium membership.

The client in this case is the users who are using Lickit's job posting system. The users can choose not to purchase the premium membership. However, if they decide to purchase the premium membership, they can choose any 1 from the 3 offered premium membership plans: monthly premium membership (RM10/month), yearly premium membership (RM100/year), or a lifetime premium membership (RM300).

Rough estimate of total income:

An average new, small-sized website expects around 1000 to 15,000 unique users per month. (Fitzgerald.A, 2023). This means that 7,500 users is a fair amount to expect. Besides that, a freemium website expects less than 40% of their user base to pay and become their premium users. For example, 17.5% of LinkedIn's users are premium users. With Lickit being a new website, we would roughly estimate half of the LinkedIn percentage of users to become Lickit's premium users.

In conclusion, Lickit expects about 7,500 unique users per month, with 8% of those unique users paying monthly to become premium members. This equals to 600 premium users who are paying RM10 per month, which equates to RM72,000 in premium membership earnings annually.

(B) Advertising ModelDiscuss monetization model:

Advertising model is a software monetization model which relies on individuals or organizations who publish their advertisements onto Lickit's job posting website. The software leaves certain spaces in its user interface to display advertisements, and generates revenue by selling these advertisement spaces to interested individuals and organizations. There is often a dedicated page for internal and external users to create advertisements. After the advertisement has been created, they can manage the advertisement details and monitor the advertisement's statistics on an advertisement dashboard.

It often collaborates with personalized advertisement algorithms, such as content-based filtering and collaborative filtering to display relevant advertisements to users. This increases the advertisement's click-through rate and user interaction rate. The higher an advertisement's click-through rate, the higher the revenue generated by the software publisher.

Lickit charges its client RM0.10 per click count. Alternatively, Lickit also offers a fixed fee of RM1000 per advertisement post for a month.

Lickit expects 15 customers per month to pay a fixed fee for an advertisement on Lickit's website. This totals up to RM15,000 per month.

(C) Transaction Fee

The transaction fee monetization model is a scalable and performance-driven approach used by online course platforms like Lickit to earn revenue by charging a commission or percentage of the transaction value. This model benefits both the platform and course creators by requiring no upfront fees and encouraging more providers to join. However, this approach has challenges, such as being tied to sales volume, being vulnerable to market fluctuations, and potentially deterring users or providers. To address these issues, the platform needs to set competitive commission rates, clearly communicate the fee structure, and choose low-cost payment gateways. Offering incentives, such as reduced fees for high-performing providers, can boost platform loyalty. Despite these challenges, the transaction fee model provides a steady revenue stream and fosters a collaborative ecosystem, as long as the fee structure balances profitability with competitiveness.

To charge a 5% commission for each course purchased on Linkit, the platform integrates a payment gateway to handle transactions seamlessly. When a user buys a course, Lickit collects the full course fee, deducts the 5% commission, and transfers the remaining amount to the course provider. This transaction fee can be a fixed amount, a percentage of the course price, or a combination of both, depending on the platform's policy.

To implement this effectively, several considerations are essential. First, the commission rate must be carefully defined to balance profitability with competitiveness, typically ranging between 5% and 15%. Transparent communication is crucial to ensure both course providers and users clearly understand the fee structure, fostering trust. Optimizing payment gateways is also important to minimize processing fees and maximize profit margins. Additionally, incentives like reduced fees or bonuses for high-performing course providers can encourage loyalty and increase engagement. By addressing these factors, Linkit can create a robust and fair monetization model that benefits both the platform and its users.

For every purchase of an online course, Linkit will automatically charge a 5% commission from the total purchase amount. This means that for a course priced at RM100, Linkit will earn RM5 as its commission. Linkit expects 1,000 transactions in a month with an average course price of RM100, the platform would earn RM5,000 in commission for that period.
